More particularly, this invention relates to a method of reclaiming nitrocellulose from a waste product generated during the manufacturing process of nitrocellulose. Nitrocellulose is a reactive polymer of the cellulose-nitro compound. It is used in rocket propellant, as a lacquer, and as a corrosion-proofing material. In World War I, as a protective coating, it is estimated that nitrocellulose was spread over 150,000 miles of trenches. As nitrocellulose coating has the advantage of stability, it is used in a huge variety of protective coatings for the protection of a range of products. One of the main uses of nitrocellulose is for coating paper and other sheet products. In the manufacturing process of nitrocellulose, in a highly-pressurized autoclave, a soluble material known as nitroethanol is made by reacting nitric acid with cellulose, a common ingredient in wood. After being formed, the resulting viscous liquid is then forced through a filter and sparged with nitrogen, so that the dissolved nitrocellulose is deposited on a paper web. At the top of the paper, nitrocellulose is cross-linked with the paper, making it strong and resistant to water. The nitrocellulose coating is then baked, and the resulting treated paper is made into boxes, suitcases, and other commodities. The nitrocellulose (also known as cellulose nitrate) coating on a cellulose product is normally very unstable, and the product is destroyed upon the slightest contact with water. Prior to World War I, the nitrocellulose coating was a relatively new invention, and prior to World War I, for chemical reasons, the World War I military required that every item that was coated with nitrocellulose be shipped by air
